Update on Herpes Treatment for Compulsive Eating? Yesterday I mentioned the research that might eventually improve the treatment of compulsive eating. At the moment, the only thing that really seems to reduce OCD (at least in those sufferers I've seen) are the medications that are specifically approved for OCD. Those are generally SSRIs and some atypical ones like serotonin-norepinephrine reuptake inhibitors (SNRIs). Here's a bit of detail from the article: Existing treatments for eating disorders are poorly supported, underdeveloped, or provide limited relief. The central treatment for EDs (eating disorders) currently involves one or more of the following: behavioural therapy cognitive-behaviour therapy psychoanalysis in-patient treatment out-patient treatment however, two factors in particular could change this landscape: a new understanding of the brain circuits involved in overeating and obesity, and new, potent medications approved for eating disorders that can be used in conjunction with behavioural techniques. This is most pertinent with Herpes treatment for Compulsive Eating?. The article was also published in the Journal of Psychiatry and Neuroscience on Saturday, March 22. You can read more about it here: I hope to see more advances in Herpes treatment for Compulsive Eating?. On a personal note, I'm already aware of several new medications that are supposedly helping my OCD. Of course, these are all unproven at this point, so we can only wait and hope. Who is "me"?
