Instead of isolating genes one by one as it is done today, scientists are looking for the building blocks (also called DNA) that make up genes. In some cases they have succeeded in finding out where the pieces are to be found, in others they have not. A large number of patients believed to be suffering from an illness of the heart, but which did not cause any symptoms, have had their genes examined. The reason for this was that it is not known in advance which genes are responsible for which diseases. These research results have now been published in some of the most important medical journals. In these papers, the researchers identify about 60 genes that produce proteins which are necessary for the formation of the heart. They are the most important findings to date in this specific area of medical research, and the scientists involved hope that they will soon be able to find out which of the genes is responsible for a particular disease. On December 17, about 4,000 foreign students and teachers came to Timor-Leste and actively engaged in social work and cultural activities, giving the image of a civil society that has returned to the war-scarred Timor-Leste. The participants of the campaign, which took place in

Timor-Leste, were from Indonesia, Cambodia, Thailand, Japan, the United States, Hungary, Slovakia and Germany. Participants of the campaign working with kids in schools in Timor-Leste. Attending the event were a number of ambassadors and ambassadors of the United Nations. The date for the campaign was decided after the leaders of the country visited a project in Timor-Leste for four years, and then chose another project which is close to the
