Formation of the myelin sheath is one of the most spectacular developmental events in the vertebrate central nervous system. The molecular processes responsible for the formation of the myelin membrane remain poorly understood. This proposal is concerned with the basic biology of the oligodendrocyte, a glial cell that has unique properties: (1) the capacity to generate a lipid membrane that is surrounded by an axon; (2) to form complex multilayered membranes on axons; and (3) to produce the axon's myelin sheath. The goal of the project is to determine how the newly-formed membrane is targeted to and inserted into the axon. The project is based on the "immunocytochemical localization" approach. This approach rests on the experimental observation that the process of myelin membrane formation is preceded by the unusual event of the oligodendrocyte membrane becoming accessible to antibodies in the axon. Such antibody bound to the oligodendrocyte membrane is used as a marker for the newly-forming membrane. The focus of the research will be on the process by which the oligodendrocyte membrane reaches the myelin membrane or the insulation around the axon. Since there are still many uncertainties about the mechanisms of membrane formation it is likely that the proposed research will elucidate only a subset of the molecular processes underlying this fascinating event.
