Inhibition of pulmonary and systemic vascular responses to arginine-vasopressin by intracellular cAMP depletion. The role of cAMP in the regulation of vasopressor responses to arginine-vasopressin (AVP) was examined in anesthetized and surgically prepared dogs. Measurements of arterial pressure and cardiac output were made during AVP infusions. AVP infusion into the left pulmonary artery (2 to 24 U/min) was a potent pressor agent. At lower AVP doses, increased cardiac output and decreased total peripheral resistance (TPR) were the mechanism by which AVP caused systemic hypertension. At higher AVP doses, an increase in the plasma renin activity was observed, indicating that the pressor response was not dependent on an action of AVP on the renin-angiotensin system. During intracellular depletion of cAMP with dibutyryl-cAMP (dbcAMP), the pulmonary pressor responses to AVP were significantly inhibited. A similar effect was observed in a group of dogs pretreated with isoproterenol, which also increased the cardiac output and decreased the TPR. While AVP infusion into the portal vein increased portal blood flow (6.3 +/- 2.5 ml/min) and lowered the TPR, this response was not inhibited by dbcAMP. Plasma cAMP levels were similar under basal and dbcAMP conditions but were significantly decreased (P less than 0.01) during AVP infusions. Thus, AVP-induced increases in cAMP in lung tissue and systemic vasculature are associated with specific pressor responses in pulmonary and systemic vessels. For all our studies concerning the structural and functional organization of the rhodopsin molecules of the vertebrate rod cell and the effects of various drugs on their physiological activity, we have developed to date various models of the rod rhodopsin's membrane environment. These are: (1) a model for rhodopsin embedded in a phospholipid monolayer; (2) a model for rhodopsin associated with a membrane domain of a lipoprotein (a structural analogue); and (3) a model for rhodopsin attached
