PSP . I don't know how things will ever turn out now, but I have to go, he said. He kissed her goodbye. The next day I went to school. There were half a dozen people who saw me, and the teachers did. But they all did, really, in that sad, confused way that's just a part of high school life. I remember this one small act of kindness - a teacher writing my name and my address on a piece of paper and giving it to me when I went in for my next assessment of grade 9. I went back in. The teacher asked me what had happened. I tried to get away from her. She put her hand on my back. I turned to run. I ran to my locker, unlocked it, and turned around to see her slowly coming towards me, just as all the others had done. By the end of the school day, she was at my side, calling names and stopping me from dodging. I remember the crowd of classmates, many crying, some laughing, some holding my arms. There was nothing to do but go to the principal's office, and take my mark for a grade 9 instead of a grade 8, a grade 9 instead of a grade 8. I don't remember much about this, but I know I was ashamed. I guess I was ashamed, and more than a little bit scared. I ran out of the school as fast as I could, got into my car, and drove home. I looked up your telephone number in the directory. I called you, and told you what had happened. You weren't home, and I left a message. I went back to school the next day for my next grade 9 assessment. You called me back, and told me that I could come to the school if I wanted to. I went to the school. I was ashamed of what had happened. I thought it was bad enough that I'd put a bad mark on my record. But I was afraid - if there's something wrong with me, then what is wrong with the rest of the people I went to school with every day? If I'm defective, then why did they accept me? Why did they like me? I know I'm not a piece of shit. I know I'm special. You told me that day that I needn't ever be ashamed of who I am or what I did. I still felt it. I was afraid. I still was afraid. As soon as I could, e79caf774b

Q: How to force xterm to use the physical keyboard layout? xterm -fa{fb} uses F1, F2, F3,... to switch focus, and F10, F11, F12 to do "help" which causes input to be recognized (e.g. "Name" to prompt for a name). These work fine for a while, but eventually it stops recognizing F-keys. I think the reason for this is that I have a Logitech keyboard, but the Thinkpad has built-in F-keys. (The Logitech keyboard just ignores the F1, F2, F3... keys, and the F10, F11, F12 are used for other things.) I am using Xubuntu 12.10, with keyboard-configuration-gui disabled. (I can't use emacs because of the "Missing $50" bug on my Thinkpad.) A: It would seem that the keyboard layout uses $ to designate "hot" keys. Someone should open a bug report, because $ is odd and needs work. I would bet that the fix is to use AltF10, AltF11, etc., rather than F10, F11, etc. Q: How to submit an ASP.Net form via Javascript from another page I have a form on an ASP.Net page. I want to submit the form from my index.html page via Javascript. So basically, I'm trying to do something like this: `$(document).ready(function () {
