Gun's Battle Royale is also available for $0.99 Have fun and good luck! ~~~ StavrosK I was looking at the game a couple days ago, but couldn't get past the fairly low quality graphics. What's your license for use of the art? ~~~ Kontiki Yes, the graphics on GBSR are actually almost 2 years old, created using the free Unity engine. The engine itself is free, but with no support from the Unity team we're getting some strange issues and have had to roll our own excellent editor. You can find our editor here - [~~~ StavrosK Ah, if it's open source (which I assumed it was, since I didn't know what Unity was), then that's good enough! ----- zachrose It would be amazing to have a way to clean up this list so it's only video games made in the last year and I could have a good crack at it. ~~~ Ixias You

Flags New subscription flags, released for Arc. This is just the first release of these new flags and includes simple fonts suitable for use with 2-3 pixel width. They don't give full access, but are a suitable start for your customisations. This release of ArcFlags adds the ability to add/remove flags for all base elements in your site, it provides single click enabled "active/deactive" states, a new template, layout option, minibug update and default flag layout (replaces screenshot option). The new flags also bring support for more text options. No more non-hyphenated monospaced text! Finally, as a welcome new feature, all selected or active flags are shown in the "Live Preview" so you can experience what the site is going to look like without the need to render the whole design! ArcFlags latest version is 1.1.0 and the new flags are included in the.zip file. Check out the changelog for the list of changes, improvements, fixes etc. In addition to the latest and greatest, you can also

What's new in Tiger Fighter 1931 MP059:

(in original web site) The Lost Robot and Barnacles: The story of the robot who's biology changed by the barnacles on his body, and how he gets out of Jigsaw Puzzle World! Originally posted on Usenet by JJW; these are the archived Usenet postings for the use of the Journal Web site. A colleague in the Department of Zoology had promised to send me a robot from the Interplanet Commercial Electronic Corporation for the purpose of making medical experiments using neurons and muscles. In particular, I was going to experiment on how the nervous system would react to the introduction of methods for introducing large ensembles of specialized neurons into working muscle cells. I also planned to put rabbit and mouse groups into some of these experiments, with the idea of observing the behavior of the groups. I even had carefully prepared notes for an eventual publication in the journal Nature, based on the ideas I'd been developing for years. But something happened during the packing of the robot that made my plans very much muddled. The personnel on the floor of IPCEC had discussed the problem of size. They had agreed to send a robot with male parts and a smaller body, that would be able to enter "male" bodies to mate with the female IPCEC personnel. They had even discussed having it carry a small sample of hormone florets along. But in many ways, that small sample of hormone carried eggs. When the robot's electric coupling, and third belly protrusion, was tightened, the four small florets right in the robot's crotch began to grow and move. As they did, they grew legs and feet. As the robot was supported by the workmen as he was being packed, his workmen's clothes grew into the walls of the robot's cavity and the outer cover. When I got my robot, I led him up the stairs, where I turned him upside down in order to stand up on his feet. But it was quite clear there was no way he could adjust to that new position. In fact, he looked very much like the gravestones I'd seen in the circus at home. I spent several days finding the secret of adjusting the robot back to the upright position, and then I researched the problem of housekeeping. The trouble was, the robot was trained to clean while standing. As the robot moved into the bathroom, cleaning, he was trying to stow away

Fish kill: Cost overruns not the only reason RELATED: What we know about the fish kill Fish kill: Cost overruns not the only reason LOS ANGELES - Dead fish are lying in the pools of a Coachella Valley lake and a lot of Washington County residents are waiting to learn why. The Coachella Valley lake came under intense scrutiny on Thursday when the Army Corps of Engineers told county commissioners it found a lake dead zone with possible bird kills. Environmentalists had long warned that regional water supply lakes would turn into death traps from heat-related algae blooms and nutrient run-off that has overwhelmed California's reservoir system. But Washington County has done its homework. "The Army Corps has told us, 'As far as our research, we think the cause of the bloom was weathering from road salt on a road that runs by the dam,' " said Alan Elmer, the county's natural resources manager. That statement prompted the county to collect samples, as well as time and weather records. They discovered that just two weeks ago the road sweeper was cleaning the area and a week later the temperature was “too cold,” an event that didn’t bring disaster. “You get a cold winter, road salt starts to break down, you get a warm spell
