[unreadable] The University of Massachusetts Medical School (UMMS), a research-intensive institution with a growing clinical training program (currently ~800 trainees), has a strong commitment to developing and promoting the careers of M.D. trainees from underrepresented minority groups (URMG) and others who have social and economic disadvantages in entering academic careers. A long-standing UMMS Graduate Traineeship Program, supported by multiple institutional resources (research, health services and academic programs), has provided a direct pipeline of trainees for the UMMS Clinical Fellowship (UMMS CF) Program for over 28 years. The UMMS CF Program provides trainees an intensive research experience in a faculty research lab and a supervised clinical experience in an affiliated clinical site. During the first four years of this CF Program, trainees take a structured series of advanced graduate level courses and make progress toward an M.D. degree. During the fifth year, the trainee completes the core curriculum of internal medicine and submits a thesis proposal. The UMMS CF Program has been developed, implemented and evaluated in a highly successful manner over the past 28 years. The CFPG is providing a strong pipeline of trainees for postgraduate research and clinical training. In this competing renewal, we propose to continue developing the UMMS CF Program. In addition, we propose to develop a number of research resources to better trainees' performance. These include the following
