(Official White House Photo by Pete Souza) On Inauguration Day this year, the Obamas hosted a menu-inspired party, in a nod to the inauguration's ties to food. I had the chance to attend and was reminded of how fun the Obamas can be in the White House. You can find out more about how to attend on the official presidential inauguration website. The menu was adapted from an upcoming cookbook, White House Smallplate, by new First Lady, former president and personal chef Michelle Obama. The menu included Chickpea and Edamame Soup, Manila Clams with Lemon Thyme, and a biscuit pudding served with pears and a vanilla bean ice cream. First Lady Michelle Obama speaks at the 90th Presidential Inauguration ceremony on the West Front of the U.S. Capitol, January 21, 2017. (Official White House Photo by Pete Souza) Soup du Jour: Chickpea and Edamame Virginia Ham Edamame - edamame is Japanese food made from soybeans, see our post on edamame for more info on edamame. The edamame pods on the right are raw and the edamame pods on the left are boiled. Edamame is very high in protein, fiber and iron. The ability to share and celebrate the joy of small plates is one of the great things about eating outside the home. It's similar to how we celebrate engagement showers, bridal showers, bachelorette parties, baby showers and other occasions outside the home. Last year
