

ceti researchers will also be able to observe dolphin life and behavior in ways we can barely imagine. they will be able to study a species for the first time ever, not just in captivity, but in the wild. in the wild, scientists can watch and capture an animal from birth to adolescence, and then watch it interact with others. this is a huge leap for understanding animal behavior. scientists will be able to observe natural dolphin behaviors, like learning to forage, hunting and socializing, not to mention reproduction and perhaps even human communication. the extraordinary tool of genetic sequencing will also be available to scientists. weve spent years and millions of dollars sequencing the human genome, but we can do so much more. for the first time, you can look into a dolphin eye and see the chemical makeup of its cornea and retina, or you can get inside a dolphin brain to better understand its sensory perceptions. we can find out how much information each organ is processing, and how its overall cognitive ability compares to ours. this is an extraordinary opportunity to understand a creature that has inspired awe, and fear, for thousands of years. the dolphins are doing a good thing. they have a great core of coaches, and on top of that, they have a consistent offense and defense. that consistency allows them to stay in the same system for multiple years and allows them to develop continuity. but there is a fine line between consistency and stagnation, and after looking at that game film, the dolphins are pulling away from the pack. in the second half, the dolphins ran the ball 50 times for 163 yards (3.2 avg), which was almost equal to the raiders' total of 50 rushes for 164 yards (3.1 avg) in the first half. the dolphins also had nine passes compared to the raiders' seven. the passing game was the difference as ryan tannehill threw for 285 yards and two touchdowns, while the raiders' derek carr threw for only 110 yards on 15 attempts. carr was sacked five times, but not as often as tannehill was.
