if you havent played the original game, though, its worth knowing that its a pretty straightforward platformer. its got a couple of different worlds each with a few stages with bubbles and obstacles that you need to overcome by bouncing into them. it has two players who control bub and bob, and at the beginning of the game each player has a single powerup. you bounce between worlds by tapping the buttons as you fall, and in each world the goal is to reach the end where two treasure chests are in the bottom. there is also a bonus level at the end of the game that features the main characters fighting a giant monster, which is a lot of fun to play. the wii version of bubble bobble isnt perfect, though. the biggest issue is the ai.

enemies behave exactly like they do in the arcade game, but theyre far more deadly. in the arcade game, the player can easily recover from enemies hitting them, but in the wii version, the enemies actually gain health as they hit the player. this means that they can beat the player to death if they hit them a second time, and even make it hard for them to recover if they hit them again. a few bosses are even so good that they can last for multiple strikes from the player, and even if they are defeated, another foe is on hand to pick up where the last one left off. the ai of enemies in the wii version also makes the game feel different and somewhat more difficult than the arcade game, especially in levels like the final showdown. levels such as this have no direction and only serve to distract players with its lack of direction and bizarre enemies. players are also treated to a few extra items, the first being a set of shoes that lets the player walk on water. the items dont really add anything to the game and are only useful for some comic relief moments. a second set of shoes lets the player walk on top of enemies, which can be particularly helpful in the last boss fight, but it is somewhat difficult to pull off since some of the enemies are missing a head.

unlike the nes version, the game boy version of bubble bobble was a straight port of the arcade game, with no additional features. the original arcade version had two buttons and was more of a side-scrolling beat-em-up, but the game boy game lacks the right-to-left scrolling and is more of a top-down action game. this means that there are no areas in the game, just a linear path that must be completed in order to reach the end. this has the effect of somewhat simplifying the game and gives the game boy version a different feel than the nes version. another change made to the game was that the game boy version was released two years after the nes version, which meant that it had more recent versions of the game to use as reference. the game boy version was also released in europe with the same names and artwork as the north american version, but with the addition of a tag saying that it was for japan. this was done to ensure that retailers wouldnt sell the european version of the game for the north american version, which would have been a mistake at the time. the master system version of bubble bobble is the most faithful to the arcade game, with even the graphics and sound being almost identical. the differences between the master system version and the arcade game are mostly in the soundtrack, where the master system version has an entirely new arrangement of the game soundtrack. this version of the game also comes with a game gear version as well, which is notable as this is the first time that the game gear was used as a primary platform for a taito game. the game gear version is similar to the master system version in that it features a new arrangement of the soundtrack, and it also features some graphics that differ slightly from the arcade version, but are nonetheless close to the master system version. 5ec8ef588b
