And they're not to be found, the most prominent mission impossible, the new, final strike, mission impossible rogue Nation, Im wondering if mission impossible 5 will be. Q: Thread in new Windows 10 task dialog box I have a Windows 10 task dialog box. The task bar dialog box has a menu called Create a new task. This dialog box allows me to add new items. I want to add a custom thread in the add item dialog box. I can do it in the classic task dialog box but not in the new task dialog box. Can I do it? A: You can create a new thread in the new task dialog box by creating a new task and adding the thread to it. If the thread is in a module, you can assign it to that module from the add task dialog. For example: TaskDialog * MyTaskDialog = gcnw TaskDialog; MyTaskDialog->RootFolder->New->LongTaskName = "Create thread in task dialog"; MyTaskDialog->RootFolder->New->Thread = gcnw Thread(gcnw ParameterizedThreadStart(MainPage::Foo)); MyTaskDialog->RootFolder->New->Message = "Thread created in task dialog"; UIApplicationMain(ApplicationEntryPoint, Start); And then you can move the thread to the new task dialog by selecting the thread and dragging it onto the new dialog. If the thread is not in a module, it can't be moved to a module. But the AddItem dialog has an option to Add to an existing task. That seems to work fine. Q: When is it good to use autorelease instead of releasing an object I just use to release an object as per the NSCoding guide but it seems it is not always necessary. I have read somewhere that it is good to use autorelease instead of releasing an object to allow the system to reclaim it. Why should I use it in that way? A: I would say use it in that way when you create an object in a method, without using a statement like: [NSObject class]; The previous statement is very bad
