This gives users the ability to fine-tune the look and feel of images and can be a very useful feature. The past method for doing this was to use Photoshop to modify the RAW files prior to importing the images into Lightroom. The new feature is called 'Create RGB Profile' and will allow users to do the same function quickly and effectively. That said, one of Photoshop's best (and most-used) features is its ability to handle huge numbers of layers. When you open a new document, a dialog box can appear. One unfortunate downside is that an InDesign plug-in is necessary for Photoshop layers to work properly. The decision to use this approach probably had to do with the popularity of the plug-in, but InDesign seems like a much more natural fit.
