The Canadian government, which has previously been accused of double standards on water-boarding, has pledged to hold the Canadian High Commissioner and officials there responsible for any mistreatment of Bekker. The ensuing political uproar and backlash on the left in Canada have led to a dramatic uptick in the number of right-wingers who are openly celebrating this news. “Most have accepted it,” Abhishek Chauhan, one of Bekker’s helpers, told me. “They’re more open about it now. I do not understand all the doom and gloom and lamentation. The left is still surprised.” This week, Malcolm Turnbull, the prime minister of Australia, said that waterboarding is “morally reprehensible and should never be used again.” My colleagues Narda Matos and Denis Campbell, Canadian writers based in the United States, have been covering Canada’s Bekker story as it has unfolded. I cannot say that I have seen everything they have seen. But what I have seen has forced me to rethink the concept of “evil.” Viewed in that light, the Bekker case is by no means a lone and singular act of evil. It is rather, a part of a much larger story of a culture of ethical violence. Through it all, we have seen our governments cowering to a terror of thought and speech—and then abandoning that terror as fast as we can blink.
