I think the selection of included brushes makes Sketch a good example of why upgrading to the new app and platform is worthwhile. Adobe offers a great selection of brushes on their website. Each brush segment can be made to look like the specific pixel art you are using. You can easily add a sketchfeather or texture to each brush segment. This saves time and makes working with Sketch an extremely pleasant experience. In Sketch, you can select any brush and manipulate its colors, although it's more straightforward if you use alternatives like the watercolor palette or the sketchpen. Apart from speed, the pen tool in Sketch is quite limited in terms of functionality. In Sketch, you can't adjust its size and, therefore, can only size the stroke of your pen. Again, the selection of brushes in Sketch is a vital component for the app in terms of usage. Another thing I like about Sketch is its inclusion of a grid. This can be beneficial, for instance, if you are working with artboards or if you want to create a sequence of sketches. Apart from this, the grid in Sketch can be helpful for sketching in general. Unlike ArtRage or Color Schemes, which offer similar painting methods in the browser, Sketch doesn't provide a sketchpad. Instead, you can click on a new sketch space, click on a color swatch underneath each sketch space, or open a new image and use its colors. The swatches in Sketch vary from simple squares to more nuanced looking gradients. Since Sketch can be considered to be a "digital painting app", I would advise you to also account for the fact that, by using an iPad as your painting tool, the app offers slight limitations regarding brush size and realistic painting effects.
