The PDGF receptor was originally identified as a transforming gene on the basis of its high-affinity binding to platelet-derived growth factor (PDGF). It has recently been demonstrated that a point mutation in the c-sis gene converts the PDGF-dependent cell line, 32D, into a PDGF-independent cell line, 32D1. From these results we hypothesized that the PDGF receptor may be a normal cellular proto-oncogene. To investigate this hypothesis we transfected 32D1 cells with a c-sis antisense expression vector and observed a block in cellular proliferation and cell cycle progression. Similarly, when the human phorbol ester-responsive keratinocyte cell line, HK-1, was transfected with this c-sis vector, cell proliferation was arrested. The inhibition of cellular proliferation was rescued by the addition of PDGF, implicating the involvement of the PDGF receptor in PDGF-dependent cellular proliferation. These results strongly suggest that the PDGF receptor is a novel proto-oncogene. Erica Garner's death has drawn national attention to the treatment of her child and her family. In the most recent case, a judge on Monday appeared to acknowledge the severity of the case, saying a civil case would be one way to "vindicate the child's family." The judge overseeing the case on Monday in New York hinted at how she might rule when she asked a prosecutor whether he was "prepared to prosecute a civil claim against the NYPD." The judge also set an upcoming hearing for the issue of whether the child should be released from the hospital and allowed to live with his father, according to the lawyer who is representing the child. Erica Garner's family on Monday said they believe their daughter could have survived if she had been immediately taken to the hospital after her confrontation with officers and that she "suffered unnecessarily" because of delays. On July 17, Eric Garner, who was known to police as a suspect in several robberies and was reportedly in possession of two knives, was stopped and put in an apparent chokehold by
