Haemoprotozoa that are frequently detected in buffaloes include Babesia ovis and B. bovis. This study was carried out to detect the presence of these parasites in buffaloes in Sri Lanka. Antibodies to B. bovis in buffaloes from 1963 (n=150) and 1947 (n=90) were tested by the indirect fluorescent antibody test (IFAT) to determine their seroprevalence and to identify antigenic variations in the Babesia bovis. Histopathology and immunohistochemistry were performed to identify babesial piroplasms. Blood samples were collected from various geographical locations and subjected to Giemsa staining and microscopic examination. Babesia ovis was not detected in any of the samples from 1963. Sixty-five (65) buffaloes were positive by IFAT to B. bovis in the 1963, indicating a seroprevalence of 44.4 per cent. Only one of those was positive by histopathology. Antigenic variations were observed in the molecules that bind to B. bovis in the 1963 and in the 1947 sera. Antibodies were found to the B. bovis 33 kDa, B. bovis 36 kDa and B. bovis 37 kDa in the 1963 serum, a pattern that was not detectable in the 1947 serum. Methods of sharing sensor data on mobile platforms are currently being developed. These methods allow for the transmission of data from a mobile device to a base station, and for the identification of the mobile device or the data on the mobile device. Because the number of users of mobile devices is increasing dramatically, and because many users have multiple mobile devices, there is an increasing
