I am glad to declare that this picture has given me the chance to make money online. And i'm grateful to this chance. Shooting hoops with a live grenade It's good to know I have a buddy who enjoys shooting hoops with live grenades. April 11, 2012 It's good to know I have a buddy who enjoys shooting hoops with live grenades. He was in a live grenade war between the United States and Iraq in 1991 - has 30 years of memories. Playing cards, dice and other things, he said, that both sides used in those days. The only thing we do not remember to be used by either side is the live grenades. He said, "If you had to ask, how many there were, it would be more than the Shriners can count." To answer the question, though, he said, "I would say probably a thousand and a half each." He noted that the hand grenades were left over from World War II, and "we didn't feel like we were doing something wrong at the time." At one time, he said, the hand grenades were used during a gang riot and the first to shoot was used up. At the time, he was leader of a company, so there were five more in a warehouse across the street. "You were only allowed one live grenade during a riot or a war," he said. He noted that the restrictions were put in place to stop the companies from carrying more than 10-14 live grenades. Firing a grenade, he said, was a matter of taking the safety off and pulling the pin. He said he used the AK-47 to shoot, as his weapon was likely to last longer. "The AK was the best," he said. Most of the grenades were used during the mortar attack on the walls and trenches of the military. "The mortar would blast on the wall, and the grenade would go off to pop the mortar," he said. The grenades that were used in this way were called snake grenades, and were effective. "The first one was effective," he said. During the shooting war, he said, they fired an estimated 90,000 hand grenades. After the "Korea-like" war in 1991, he said, the ammunition was shipped to the United States and nothing more was heard of it. After the war, he added, the United States paid the
