Finally, great news for Mac users: Adobe released Photoshop Elements 2019 for Mac. On the Windows side, we already reported that it would be compatible with Windows 10 April 2018 Update. That's it. As we already know, Photoshop Elements for Mac does not include the Voice Typing feature. However, the software version included is higher than that of the Windows version. This means that some of the previous features will be present. Welcome to the union of Adobe Photoshop CC on Mac and Windows. While photo editing has always been one of the most powerful and resource intensive programs, the sheer installation size of the toolkit made using it an absolute pain... In my own opinion, it's Photoshop's best app. Performance is on par with the desktop version, and it's not hindered by any OS-related aspects anymore. For those who need to work with image adjustments quite frequently, I'd say the typical difference between Lightroom and Photoshop is that while Lightroom gives you greater control over the adjustments you make, Photoshop is better able to make complex image manipulations. Lightroom handles general color adjustments and the workflow for applying changes, whereas Photoshop allows much greater complexity. That being said, the results from both cameras are quite good. The sharpness looks very good on both cameras. The only real difference I can see is in the very top left border of the image. The new camera seems to do better at recovering details in that area. There's a definite improvement between the two cameras, but it isn't enough to justify the extra $150 for the new Nikon D3200. Although the D3200 looks sharper, the Sony a7R II and the D5600 are actually better at capturing those details. The D5600's results are just a hair better than the D3200, while the a7R II has the advantage over both those as well as the D3200. In terms of depth-of-field, the new camera does produce better results. Most of the time, the difference is very small, but it can be quite noticeable if needed.
